

The public ultimately will suffer if media ownership in local areas becomes concentrated in the hands of fewer independent sources. Diversity of opinion and independence of news gatherers enables the public to be informed more fully and to make opinions more objectively. Concentration of ownership will reduce that opportunity. There seems to be little evidence that deregulation of various public utilities and similar ventures has been in the best interest of the public. This concentration of authority is likely to show the same